Summary:

The Places in Between is a travelogue written by Rory Stewart, a British diplomat and author. The book chronicles Stewart's journey across Afghanistan in January 2002, shortly after the fall of the Taliban. Stewart set out from Herat in the west of the country and walked eastward, crossing the Hindu Kush mountains and the deserts of central Afghanistan, before reaching the capital, Kabul. Along the way, he encountered a variety of people, from nomads and villagers to warlords and Taliban fighters. He also encountered a range of cultures, from the traditional Islamic culture of the Pashtuns to the more modern culture of the Hazaras. Stewart's journey was not only a physical one, but also a spiritual one, as he sought to understand the people and culture of Afghanistan. He also sought to understand the history of the country, and the events that had led to the fall of the Taliban. The Places in Between is an insightful and thought-provoking account of Stewart's journey, and a valuable insight into the culture and history of Afghanistan.
