Reilly, an educated but slothful 30-year-old man living with his mother in New Orleans. The police officers of New Orleans are a constant presence in A Confederacy of Dunces. They are often portrayed as corrupt and incompetent, with Ignatius Reilly frequently clashing with them due to his disdain for authority figures. The police officers' incompetence is highlighted when they fail to apprehend the hot dog vendor who has been harassing Ignatius throughout the novel, despite having multiple opportunities to do so. Furthermore, their corruption is demonstrated by their willingness to accept bribes from Mr. Levy in exchange for not arresting him after he was caught shoplifting.

Ignatius's interactions with the police also serve as an example of how his own stubbornness can lead him into trouble. He refuses to cooperate or compromise with them even when it would be beneficial for him, such as when he refuses Officer Mancuso's offer of leniency if he agrees to leave town quietly. This leads directly to his arrest and subsequent incarceration at the mental hospital.

Overall, Toole uses the police officers in A Confederacy of Dunces both as a source of comic relief and as a way to illustrate Ignatius's character flaws and tendency towards self-sabotage.

In addition to providing comedic relief, these cultural references also help readers understand how characters interact with each other and their environment.
